Ducks, Trojans prepare for battle in key Pac-10 Conference game

By Steve Mims
Oregon Daily Emerald

Oregon and USC head into Saturday's game with opposite records, but the teams find themselves in similar positions.

Both teams are coming off of disappointing Pacific-10 Conference losses last Saturday and are hoping to rebound with a win this week. Oregon (3-1 overall, 0-1 in the conference) blew a 30-0 lead at California last weekend before falling 42-41 to the Golden Bears, and the Trojans (2-3, 1-1) were trounced 38-7 at Arizona.

Saturday's game at Autzen Stadium has been moved to 3:38 p.m. to accommodate a live telecast by Prime Network.

The Trojans are coming off of a torturous early-season schedule that has seen them lose to No. 15 North Carolina, eighth-ranked Penn State and the 12th-ranked Wildcats. USC head coach John Robinson is hoping to turn the season around beginning this weekend.

"From our perspective, we have to win this game," said Robinson, who graduated from Oregon in 1958 and was a Duck assistant coach for 12 years. "Then we have to come home and beat Oregon State. If we do that, we are 3-1."

Oregon head coach Rich Brooks has set high goals for his team this year and knows Saturday's game is essential if they are to achieve those goals.

"If we lose this game, we are probably not going to the Rose Bowl," Brooks said. "I am uncertain as to what they will try to do, but I expect them to run the ball. If they look at our films and see how we defended passes against Montana and California they might be inclined to throw it."

USC has a rich tradition of running the ball under Robinson, but injuries may limit their ability to do so. The Trojans lost starting running back Dwight McFadden in the season-opening loss to North Carolina, and three starters on the offensive line will miss the game, including All-American tackle Tony Boselli.

The Trojans have been hit by the injury bug on special teams as well this weekend, as kicker Cole Ford has a stress fracture in his back and may redshirt the season. Mike Salmon, the team's strong safety, has taken over the kicking duties and has made two of his three field goal attempts this year.

USC's running game becomes even more uncertain this week when Robinson mentioned he may replace starting tailback David Dotson with freshman Shawn Walters. Walters leads USC in rushing with 187 yards, despite having more than half as many carries as Dotson.

USC may open up the passing game, which features the dangerous combination of quarterback Rob Johnson and receiver Johnny Morton. Johnson has completed 68.8 percent of his passes for 1,236 yards and 10 touchdowns. Morton has been on the receiving end of 40 of those passes and averages more than 15 yards per reception. The 6-foot-2 receiver caught three touchdown passes in USC's 30-7 win over the Ducks last year in Los Angeles.

Oregon's passing offense has been explosive as well early in the season, led by quarterback Danny O'Neil, who ranks eighth in the country in total offense and ninth in passing efficiency. O'Neil is averaging 303 yards passing per game and has a 3-1 touchdown-to-interception ratio.

"There has never been four better games in a row by a quarterback at Oregon than Danny has played in the first four games," Brooks said. "We've had (Bob) Berry, (Chris) Miller, (Dan) Fouts and (Bill) Musgrave; none of the others have played four games in a row like O'Neil has played this year."

USC's defense is spearheaded by linebacker-turned-defensive end Willie McGinest. The senior led the Pac-10 a year ago with 16 quarterback sacks, and currently leads the team with 31 tackles and six pass deflections.
