more touchdowns in a game on five occasions.

• So, don't expect Oregon's defense to pitch a shutout. Oregon is allowing its opponents about 380 yards per game in total offense. This places the Ducks in dangerous territory: Stanford is 3-1 in games where it gains at least 400 yards.

On the other side of the ball, the Stanford defense has given up at least 400 yards in all but one game. The Oregon offense averages more than 400 yards per game. Offensive players may be tackling each other in the end zone more often than they get hit by the defense.

• On the other hand, Stanford's offense frequently shoots itself in the foot. Stanford averages 3.5 turnovers per game. The Cardinal is 0-6 in games where it has turned the ball over more frequently than its opponent has.

• Oregon's kicker has a 25-pound weight advantage over Stanford's kicker. The Ducks' Tommy Thompson also has a little more range and consistency than the Cardinal's Eric Abrams.

Thompson has made all 10 of his field goal attempts from inside the 40-yard line. He's made three of seven attempts from outside the 40. Abrams has made six of eight from inside the 40 and is three of six from long range.

• Stanford can't stand adversity. It hasn't won a game all season when its opponent scores first or leads at halftime. The Cardinal also has a problem coming out after halftime: It can find the field, but it has trouble remembering what to do there. Stanford has been outscored 110-47 in third quarters the season.

This may be good news for a Duck team that has a reputation for starting quickly and fading at the finish. Oregon has outscored its opponents 71-21 in the first quarter but has been outscored 125-89 in second halves.

• A high-scoring game appears to favor the Ducks. Oregon is 3-1 in games when it scores 24 or more points and 2-2 in games when it allows 24 or more points. Stanford is 3-3 in games when it scores 24 or more points and is 0-3 when it allows 24 or more.

• Against common opponents, the two teams appear relatively equal. Oregon has the only victory against a common opponent, a 45-36 win against Arizona State, which defeated Stanford 38-30.

Both teams were beaten soundly by Washington and USC, and both teams lost to Arizona as well.
