

ASK ADVICE

Superfly

I am deeply concerned with my lack of ability to pick up women in my classes. When I ask them to spend time with me after class they often seem apprehensive and it never pans out. What am I doing wrong, Superfly?

Need a date

Perhaps you are going about it the wrong way. It takes a lot of effort to get to know someone. You don't want to scare her off, but once you memorize our six easy steps, the fly chicks will be yours. 1) If she's in your class, then sit next to her and ask her if you can borrow a pen. 2) As she walks out of class, ask her where the party is this weekend. Eventually your relationship will grow. 3) Once this is achieved, find out where she hangs out. 4) Spontaneously appear at these places and eventually make conversation. 5) Now that you are friends, attempt to make casual plans. 6) If she never has time for you and consistently blows you off, move on.

own-game style of slow-down basketball.

Williams knew that if he played well, he would fit in perfectly with Green's system.

"When Green got here, he brought with him a lot of the same philosophies Loyola had," he said. "That kind of basketball is exactly the kind of system I fit into best."

After a summer trip to Europe, the team started to get a grasp of Green's game plan, but Williams and Stoudamire caught on a little faster. The two led the Ducks in scoring in the preseason, but Williams started to tail off in the scoring department once Pac-10 play started. Stoudamire took over the bulk of the scoring for Oregon as Williams struggled to get his shot back.

After a number of ho-hum performances in the first seven conference games, Williams caught fire to average 17 points a game for the rest of the season, and fans got accustomed to seeing Williams spot up at the three-point arc for the trey.

Green said Williams' play last season was not only important from a scoring aspect, but also because it made Oregon's offense easier to execute.

"One thing we found last season is that a lot of teams would change their defense depending on whether Orlando was in the game or not," he said. "Teams like to play zone against us. But when Orlando's in, teams have to play man defense because of his outside shooting ability."

The Ducks still only won 10 games, but there was at least some hope on the horizon.

GREENBALL

Following last season, Green and his coaches recruited heavily and brought in seven new players, including two players, Darryl Parker and Jamar Curry, that play Williams' position. If it were the same team as last season (minus Stoudamire and Andre Collier, who graduated), Williams would no doubt be the main man.

But Green and Williams are both impressed with the new players, and there are still questions looming in both their minds about where Williams will fit in.

"Orlando's going to be challenged at his position," Green said. "We've got five players (Williams, Parker, Curry, Jordy Lyden and Jon Mitchell) at the off-guard position."

Williams, however, does not seem all that worried about his place on the team.

"All I know is what I've read," Williams said. "I know the coaches are expecting me to come back and be a main contributor, and that's what I'm hoping to do."

And as far as being the main man in the offense, after being the man in the shadows for the three years at Oregon, Williams said it's not that important to him.

"Being the No. 1 guy doesn't really matter in this system," Williams said. "I wouldn't mind being the leading scorer or team captain or even MVP, but it's such a team concept. That stuff isn't as important."

The Ducks are picked by most publications to finish ninth or 10th in the conference, but Williams hopes to make them eat their words.

"There are going to be a lot of upsets," he said. "I'll be happy if we finish in fifth or sixth, but the main thing I want to do is beat Arizona and UCLA."
