TENANTS

"The destruction of any low-cost housing will be a disaster for the entire community," Ford said.

David Zupan of Eugene Citizens for Low-Cost Housing gave the board a historical perspective on the Amazon situation. In the late 1970s the University was considering plans to tear down and replace Amazon.

Zupan said that tenants offered to take over management of the complex in cooperation with the University. Then-University President William Boyd initially accepted, then rejected the plan, and added $20 to rental rates.

That action prompted a rent-strike at Amazon that ended when administration officials renegotiated management arrangements of the complex, granting tenants more autonomy. It was about this time that the child-care facilities were also built.

An engineering study done at the time said that the Amazon complex could last for another 20 to 30 years, and the University then spent some capital improvement money on new roofs and foundations for the buildings.

"Why would the University now say that investment was for nothing? To defer this issue to the University could be a drastic mistake. This housing is so crucial that tearing it down would have a direct effect on the entire community. At the very least, it would be prudent to step back and take a look at all the possible options here," Zupan said.

Zupan said that although the idea of using bond money for the construction of new housing is "very appropriate" any new buildings should not be built at Amazon.

University officials said last week they are planning a new study of the Amazon buildings to look into the costs and benefits of maintaining Amazon vs. tearing down and replacing the complex. The current time line calls for completion of the study by Dec. 31.

Before the board meeting, Amazon tenants staged a "Short March for Justice" from the EMU Courtyard to Johnson Hall. They carried a mock coffin they said symbolized "the potential death of low-cost housing in Eugene."
