Weather causing havoc in Oregon

PORTLAND (AP) — Freezing rain caused numerous traffic problems throughout the Portland area and much of the rest of northern Oregon Sunday morning.

"Our recommendation is simply do not drive until it starts to warm up," said Carol Yetter, supervisor of the 911 emergency dispatch center in Portland. "It's stupid to do it unless you have a four-wheel-drive truck. You're just going to get into an accident. You could die."

Yetter said there were reports of numerous traffic crashes, many of them involving jackknifed semi-truck and trailer rigs. She said ambulances were busy responding to injury accidents.

"Older people are going out to get their papers and falling," Yetter said.

She said people who don't have to travel should stay home.

"The Nordstrom sale certainly isn't worth losing your life over or wrecking your car over," Yetter said.

The National Weather Service cancelled the freezing rain advisories for the Willamette Valley and Columbia Gorge shortly after 9 a.m., but warned that slick conditions could persist on roadways throughout the day.

Freezing rain advisories continued in effect for the Columbia Basin and north central Oregon.

State police said chains were required on Interstate 84 through the Columbia River Gorge, where driving conditions were treacherous but no serious accidents had been reported by late this morning.

More moisture was expected to spread into Oregon tonight and Sunday, bringing a renewed threat of freezing rain over central and Eastern Oregon and near the Columbia River Gorge.

Power failure brings strange coping methods

BENTON CITY, Wash. (AP) — Charlotte Machart feared a power failure in sub-zero weather early Friday would be too cold for her cockatiel, so she blew on the bird all night to keep it warm.

Machart said she thought about taking the bird to bed with her but was afraid she might crush it in her sleep.

"So I stayed up and breathed on her to keep her warm," Machart said. "This morning she looked at me, whistled, and said, 'Pretty girl.' That told me she got through it OK."

Some 700 homes in this southeastern Washington community were without power for six hours, beginning at 1:30 a.m. when one of the Benton Rural Electric Association's main feeder lines broke. Full power was restored by 7:30 a.m., general manager Chuck Dawsey said.

The failure also blew a fuse in a Bonneville Power Administration transformer, which was repaired.

Overnight temperatures dropped as low as five below zero.

Freezing rain blamed for deaths in car crash

PORTLAND (AP) — Two people died in a traffic crash Saturday as freezing rain created treacherous driving conditions across much of northern Oregon.

The fatal crash occurred about 2:30 a.m. when a small car northbound on Interstate 205 in suburban southeast Portland slid out of control and crashed into a concrete pillar.

State police identified the victims as Michelle Pugh, 22, and Jason Mann, 21, both of Cottage Grove. Pugh's three-week-old daughter and two other adults in the car were hospitalized in fair condition.

Pugh and Mann were riding in the right side of the car. The car crashed into one of the pillars that carries Johnson Creek Boulevard over the freeway.

Pugh was pronounced dead at the scene. Mann died a short time later at University Hospital.

The crash was the most serious of many that were reported because of freezing rain that fell in the Portland area. A 10th of an inch of precipitation was recorded at Portland International Airport, "which is quite a bit for freezing rain," said Craig Schmidt, a meteorologist for the National Weather Service.

Early Saturday, conditions were hectic at the 911 emergency dispatch center in Portland.

Supervisor Carol Yetter said there were reports of numerous traffic crashes, many of them involving jackknifed semi-truck and trailer rigs. She said ambulances were busy responding to injury accidents.

"Older people are going out to get their papers and falling," Yetter said.

The ice melted in the Portland area later in the day as temperatures warmed.

Motorists had been required to use chains on Interstate 84 through the Columbia Gorge early in the day but that requirement was later lifted.

More rain was forecast Sunday, but warmer temperatures were expected to keep it from freezing.
