

Pizza strippers offend patrons

MOSES LAKE, Wash. (AP) — A popular pizza parlor has been fined for exposing parents and children in its main dining room to strippers performing at a bachelor party in back.

Chico's Pizza Parlor has made alterations to ensure there are no further incidents, manager Mitch Zornes said Wednesday.

The Washington State Liquor Control Board fined the restaurant $1,750 for allowing suggestive, lewd or obscene conduct and for failing to control the conduct of patrons in the July 31 incident.

The Ephrata man who filed the complaint said he was speechless with shock when a windowless door to the back room opened and revealed a woman clad only in a G-string, according to the board's report.

"That girl didn't have any clothes on, daddy," the complainant quoted his 8-year-old son as saying.

Zornes said he heard a commotion during the hour-long bachelor party, but did not realize family diners were being exposed to goings-on in the back room.

The man who booked the room did not make clear strippers were expected at the party, and Zornes said the restaurant would not have agreed to their performing on the premises.

A window has been installed on the back-room door so management can monitor parties, he said.

"We've never had a problem for 30 years," Zornes said. "They caught us a little off guard."

FUND

center itself, or the Incidental Fee Committee.

The fund was instigated after Jolene Siemsen, a nurse practitioner at the health center, and a few others went before the task force last spring to explain that a number of students had been in the office who had been assaulted but didn't want to report the crime.

Siemsen said it was extremely important that these students get tested and treated, otherwise they leave themselves open to serious manifestations of STDs, such as infertility, cancer or death.

Annie Dochnahl, peer health advising coordinator at the health center, said that because these students don't want to report the assault, they can't receive insurance money to pay the approximate $145 testing fee. That's why the fund was instigated — to help students who couldn't afford testing any other way.

A student who uses the fund doesn't have to file an official report in any way. The testing information, with the exception of HIV test results, will go into the student's medical file, which is confidential. HIV results are pseudo-anonymous, meaning the student talks to a counselor who sees the name and test result, but the information does not go into the student's permanent record.

There are myriad reasons why students won't report a sexual assault, Dochnahl said. Some are scared or ashamed, believing perhaps it was their fault, she said. As a result, they don't want others to find out about it. Others are in a constant state of denial; they don't want to admit it could happen to them, she said.

There is a formal rape protocol, wherein the victim goes to the Sacred Heart General Hospital emergency room to be examined for forensic evidence of sexual assault, Dochnahl said. She said this can be intimidating, and that the assault fund is set up to offer a caring, human alternative where the victim doesn't have to report anything.

Many victims of a sexual assault tend to think the physical damage they incur is mental, Dochnahl said. Physical issues are also important, because students who contract a sexually transmitted disease should know as soon as possible for the sake of themselves and their partners, she said.

In addition, some STDs are curable, Fleischli said. Chlamydia, gonorrhea, syphilis and Human Papilloma Virus can all be cured, whereas hepatitis B, herpes and HIV cannot, though treatment may be available.
