

Super Bowl could be really super with some help

It's really too bad the Super Bowl is only one week away. We all remember the days when the teams had two weeks to prepare for the big game, and ESPN had two weeks to shamelessly hype the championship game, which turns out to be a dud more times than not.

This season, however, all the hype will not be able to steal the headlines from Portland's pride and joy, Mrs. White Trash herself, Tonya Harding.

The only thing the NFL can hope for is that the Super Bowl is actually a super bowl. A good game, as in a game that goes down to the wire with one of the teams scoring the winning touchdown on the final play of the game, is out of the question. After all, Buffalo's playing.

The real key to making this game a top-notch entertainment event is to have plenty of sight gags, celebrities and stupidity. A real knock down, drag out Hollywood production.

Here are some examples of what would make Sunday's Super Bowl a memorable one.

- Michael Jordan, during a day off from baseball spring training, takes over at quarterback for the Dallas Cowboys after Troy Aikman sprains his ankle doing the two-step in celebration of a touchdown pass.

Jordan comes off the bench to throw for 350 yards, runs for two touchdowns and does enough cute little poses to fill every cereal box in the country.

Following the game, Jordan announces he's retiring from football because, "I've accomplished everything there is to accomplish. I need to spend more time with my family, and between playing Major League Baseball and my plans to try out with the Chicago Blackhawks, the PGA Tour, the Pro Bowler's Tour and the Women's Olympic Ice Skating team, playing football just doesn't fit into my schedule right now."

Asked for any last words, he looks in the camera and screams, "I'm gonna kick your butt Kerrigan."

- Leon Lett, Dallas' master of stupidity, dives over the line on second down thinking Buffalo is kicking a field goal and injures three of his own players. As the ball pops loose, he picks it up and rambles 50 yards, not hearing the repeated whistle of the ref. Finally, head coach Jimmy Johnson runs on to the field steps in front of Lett screaming "Stop you bumbling idiot!"

Lett mistakes Johnson for a Bills' lineman and bulls over Johnson. As Johnson falls in a heap at the 20-yard line, his hair flies off, revealing he really wears a toupee.

Moments later, Cowboy owner Jerry Jones announces on the air to Ahmad Rashad on the sidelines that Lett is kicked off the team.

- You know those dumb-looking vehicles in the shape of a helmet that they use to carry injured players off the field? Well, for the first half of the the halftime extravaganza, Tonya Harding, dressed in a muscle half-shirt that says "Awesome" on the front, is released from her holding cell and gives a demonstration on how to fix the carburetors in them while smoking a full pack of cigarettes before she's finished.

- For the second part of the halftime show, Lorena Bobbitt gives a demonstration on ... well, maybe not.

- In the now infamous Bud Bowl — which is becoming more popular than the Super Bowl — Bud Light trails by five in the closing seconds with the ball on Budweiser's two-yard line when they bring in their secret weapon: Running back "Eckardt Ale," the 350-pound bearded bottled slob noted for his counterterrorism, counter-sniping and unconventional warfare, barrels through the line to win the game for Bud Light on the final play of the game.
