Seats open on Ducks' bandwagon

Last Thursday, I did something I thought I would never do again for the rest of my life.

Yes, I went and watched a women's basketball game.

I jumped on that bandwagon and went to see the Oregon women beat Arizona.

My first year here, I went to see a women's game and was thoroughly bored. The game was boring, the fans were non-existent and the whole atmosphere was comparable to a sixth-grade Kidsports game at the local grade school.

It was from that point on that I vowed never to go to another women's game as long as I lived.

But what was I supposed to do when the Oregon women's basketball team beat 16th-ranked Washington in Seattle and started talking about making the NCAA Tournament.

The bandwagon was a-rollin' and I went a-chasin'.

But I don't feel all that bad about it because I obviously wasn't the only one to decide Thursday would be a good chance to catch a glimpse of the Ducks.

There was actually a fairly good size crowd of about 1,000 at the Arizona game — one of the biggest crowds to catch a women's game in a long time. The crowd was loud, the Duck mascot was there, the band was there. Hell, even Rich Brooks was there.

The court announcer spared no expense in talking up the Oregon women when they hit their shots, and Duck head coach Jody Runge spared no expense in giving the refs an earful occasionally.

There were three-pointers (lots of three-pointers), fast breaks, blocked shots and hard fouls.

So I jumped on the bandwagon. So what? Is it all that wrong for me to go watch an Oregon game simply because I think it will be a good chance to see the Ducks win for a change?

Does anyone think for a moment that coach Runge or any of the Oregon players are insulted in the least bit if they happen to show some narrow-minded sports fan like myself, that, yes, women's basketball can be fun to watch?

The answer is no.

It is all right to jump on the bandwagon.

The Ducks are 11-5 overall and 5-2 in the Pacific-10 Conference. They are tied for second place in the conference and have a very legitimate shot at making the NCAA tournament in March.

Runge is in her first year as head coach of the Ducks and is making Brooks look like a genius for firing Elwin Heiny last spring.

It's all there, sports fans. The charm, the excitement, the baggy shorts. It's basketball.

Yes, it's true the men's team is better than last year, but it isn't winning. The women are.

This isn't to say stop going to the men's games but to also go to see the women. Go ahead, don't be afraid. Jump on the bandwagon ... if for no other reason than to thank the women for giving this school a bandwagon worth jumping onto.
