Coach takes leave after odd acts

CHICAGO (AP) — Ricky Byrdsong came to Northwestern with a tough approach for a struggling basketball program, promising an opportunity for his players to show they were better than their record.

Now, the rebuilding is on hold, and Byrdsong has taken a leave of absence after a weekend game that saw him roam the stands, slapping hands with fans and the opponent's mascot.

When Byrdsong took over, he removed Patrick Baldwin as team captain, made Dion Lee change his name and ran tough practices.

The Wildcats initially responded, opening with nine victories before reality arrived in the form of the Big Ten season. Now, after eight straight losses, the Wildcats are back in their familiar spot in the conference basement, and Byrdsong has asked for some time off.

Both athletic director Rick Taylor and assistant coach Paul Swanson, now in charge of the team, say they are not sure why Byrdsong asked for the leave of absence.

"I didn't see any more strain than any other coach has gone through," Swanson said Tuesday, the day after the leave of absence was announced. "He'd been very focused in practice. Other than that I can't see any additional strain.

Swanson and Taylor declined to divulge where Byrdsong was staying or what he was doing. Neither was sure how long the leave would last.

"All I can say is I truly and honestly don't know," Swanson said.

Swanson actually did the coaching Saturday night when Byrdsong turned the team over to him and spent most of the game sitting on a chair at the end of the bench.

Byrdsong twice went on the floor to argue calls and was assessed a technical. Ten minutes into the second half, he went into the stands, then returned to the bench and later went back to the stands. He was sitting in the aisle when an usher asked him to move.

Byrdsong stretched the limits of that family early on. He not only made Lee change his name back from Dion to his first name of Kenneth but switched his uniform number from 24 to 10.

"We didn't like anything about No. 24 Dion Lee," Byrdsong said at the time.
