UNIVERSITY

Savings mount with office supply program

By Ben Moebius
Oregon Daily Emerald

The Reusable Office Supply Exchange, in the eight months it has been in operation, has saved the University more than a few paper clips.

The program, which is open to faculty, staff, graduate teaching fellows, student groups and administration, is a place to leave surplus supplies and pick up many needed items free.

Karyn Kaplan, who works for campus recycling, said the program has saved almost $11,000 since it started.

The small room on the north end of Prince Lucien Campbell contains almost every office supply item ever imagined. The shelves are stocked with Rolodexes, rubber bands, adhesive labels, adding machines, index cards and more.

Todd Parrington works in the exchange a few hours a week taking inventory, adding up the value of the items. He finds out what the items that are taken would have cost if they were purchased instead.

A key to the exchange can be checked out at the English department in Room 118 PLC. A small form is filled out to keep track of what is taken and what is left.

The program promotes reuse of items that would otherwise be thrown away. Kaplan urges those who can to take advantage of the supplies, but said students at large are not allowed to participate.

Kaplan said the exchange was first thought up by management service employees that noticed a high amount of waste in offices throughout the University.

Kaplan said that thanks to administrative support of recycling efforts on campus, small programs are being created that save the University money.
