John Funk, a Japanese major, and Kari Neigebauer, a pre-dance major, browse the doll section at McKenzie Honey Farms and Gifts. There are many great toy shops in Eugene.

non-frustrating way," said Julie Chown, sales director.

Discovery Toys is listed in the phone book, and clients can call for personal shopping appointments or party requests in which they can view and test the toy. All toys are non-toxic, and most are plastic and encourage hand-eye coordination.

This may be fine for down-to-earth education, but children can learn good ariel coordination skills with kites. Kites and Other Delights in Fifth Street Public Market provides more than adequate tools for the next best thing to flight. Stunt kites, standard kites, dragon kites—all can be found in this colorful little shop as well as Koosh toys, frisbees, t-shirts and other little trinkets.

"We carry toys for kids from five to 95," said Lauri Seubert, owner.

As it, and all other toy stores, should.

RESTAURANT

of its history and that of the Eugene community, which can be found in the pictures that line the wall of one of the more recent additions to the original building. Yellowed newspaper clippings accompany some of the old snapshots which shyly hide behind the salad bar, revealing clues to the city's past. While glancing at old photos of the building's interior, one sees simplicity and elegance in the marble which paved the floor of the lobby and in the high ceilings which provided space for tall, beveled windows that let in floods of light.

Today, the building maintains its simple theme.

Though much has been added over the years, the restaurant does not overwhelm customers with antique clutter. It is obviously not necessary to the atmosphere. The real flavor of the place lies not just in its award-winning wine cellar or wonderful meals, but in the delight of simply being able to eat in an old, stylish train car and imagining what a meal on the train was like when the station was in its heyday some 70 years ago. That, no doubt, is the real beauty of the Oregon Electric Station and probably the chief reason it enjoys such popularity and is able to remain at the top of most everyone's list of favorite places in Eugene.
