Summer rush: Hollywood works overtime to make summer deadlines

Nick Nolte is in Paris, Julia Roberts is in New York and Charles Shyer is in overdrive.

The director of the Disney summer movie I Love Trouble is trying to finish his film about competing Chicago journalists (played by Nolte and Roberts) and the clock is ticking. The film opens June 29, and on a normal timetable there are several months of work yet to be done.

But there's no such thing as normal timetables with summer movies.

Using a state-of-the-art communications system, Shyer and his producing partner, Nancy Myers, are working with Roberts and Nolte to record new dialogue, even though the actors are thousands of miles from the Southern California soundstage.

It's rush hour in Hollywood and Shyer isn't the only filmmaker scampering to finish a summer movie. All over town, directors, editors and engineers are suffering through 18-hour days, late-night pizza and gallons of warmed-over coffee to make their crucial debut dates.

The summer season is the year's most profitable — and competitive — period. Studios and the occa-
