he said.

In a piece called "Tell Mama All About It," a young black woman sits on a bed. It is not apparent what just happened, Smith said, but "It's not an accident." That a hardware store sign appears as it does in the background.

"I think women in society are treated that way (as hardware)," he said.

Smith gave background on some of the pieces in this latest show.

"Strange Fruit," a piece after which the show is named, shows the lynching of a black man. The name of the piece, Smith said, came from a Billie Holiday song, where upon seeing such a hanging, she commented on the "Strange Fruit" hanging from trees.

In "The Two Eves," Smith depicts two female figures in the garden of Eden. A white woman stands in the foreground, while a black woman is in the background. Smith said the discovery of Lucy in Mesopotamia inspired this work. It made him "think about who Eve may have been."

Smith's paintings are large, with most pieces being larger than 60 inches square.

Color, however, dominates Smith's work.

"My work is a lot about color," Smith said, calling himself a "figurative colorist."

"Color affects you whether you like it or not. I can get to a lot of feelings with it," he said.

Smith, the man, uses his hands to express himself in conversation. Smith, the painter, uses hands for expression as well.

"The hands are just as expressive as the face," Smith said.

Hands in Smith's paintings are large, like his paintings.

"I can grab onto feeling with those hands," he said.
