Savage Professorship Nominations

The campus community is invited to contribute names of candidates for the Savage Professorship in International Relations and Peace. We are looking to identify and select a scholar on the peacemaking process of the Arab-Israeli conflict to fill the 1995-96 position. The professorship is designed to "enhance the educational offerings of the University in the fields of the humanities and social sciences, focusing particularly on the study of international relations, peace and the United Nations."

kept many "different" writers from being published.

"There were lots of dull books — that was the policy of the writer's union," she said. "The union had a lot of power and so the books became much more about politics than about art."

Today, the union doesn't exist but it is still hard to get a book published — but for economical rather than political reasons. Because inflation often skyrockets in Russia, publishers frequently lose money on book deals.

In fact, her second book, titled Sleepwalker in a Fog, didn't even get published in her own country due to high inflation, but was nonetheless published in 13 languages.

Tolstaya's lectures, which are open to the public, occur Wednesdays and Fridays from 3 to 5 p.m. in 115 Pacific Hall. Her last lecture will be on Jan. 27.

In addition, Tolstaya will give a talk in Russian Jan. 25 and answer questions at 7:30 p.m. in Gerlinger Alumni Lounge.

Among contemporary Russian writers, Tolstaya discusses Sasha Sokolov, Liudmila Petrushevskaya, Viktor Pelevin, Vladimir Makanin and Viacheslav Petskuk in her lectures.

Tolstaya is the Russian department's Marjorie Lindholm Professor of Russian Language, Literature and Culture. Additionally, her Oregon appearances are sponsored by the University Department of Russian and the Russian and East European Studies Center.

She is currently associate professor of Creative Writing at Skidmore College in New York.

"I am here in the states, but my head is in Moscow," she said. "I am Russian — past, present and future."

been another issue concerning both students and faculty. Former Senate President Davison Soper questioned how much voting power students should have in a University Senate.

"A new senate," Soper said, "in order to be effective, has to have the trust of faculty. It has to be viewed as legitimate."

In the past, Soper said, students voted as a block, giving them too strong of a voice in the University Senate. Students currently have one-third of the votes in the University Senate, but less than 2 percent of the vote in the Assembly.

Student Senate President Martin Fisher defended the current student representation.

"On the new Student Senate, people are very serious," he said. "And they are willing to think for themselves."

Most faculty are hesitant to completely abolish the assembly. A need exists, they said, for open discussion on important campus issues. The multicultural curriculum debates during the past two years were given as an example.

Soper said he doesn't advocate getting rid of the assembly, but that there is a "clear mandate for change."

Academic Advising and Student Services Counselor Jack Bennett defended the assembly as a court of last resort.

"Although the assembly is generally an inefficient form of government," Bennett said, "decisions made in the assembly are likely to be implemented with less discord than if made in a senate people feel is not representative."

INTERNET

He said that these questions must be resolved before the scope of a university's authority can be determined.

At Carnegie Mellon, after the incident in November, a committee of faculty, administrators and students was formed "to make some recommendations for some type of guidelines regarding the Internet," Hale said.

At the University, it is very difficult to check for what is being said on news groups due to the volume of messages, said Bruno Vanden Abeele, lab assistant at the EMU computing center.

Because there is no central body to regulate the Internet, regulation is difficult as well, he said. "It's developed by anyone who wants to develop it," he said.

"We're in a new world and the courts will have to sort [regulations] out," Gleason said.

"But I do hope whatever happens, we will maintain the maximum freedom of expression for news groups and other on-line sources."
