Drexler gets wish, goes to Houston

DALLAS (AP) — Clyde Drexler, who played 11 seasons with the Portland Trail Blazers, got the trade he had requested Tuesday, going to the Houston Rockets with forward Tracy Murray for forward Otis Thorpe, the Blazers announced Tuesday evening.

The NBA champions will also give Portland the rights to 1993 second-round draft pick Marcelo Nicola and a conditional first-round draft choice in the 1995 NBA draft.

Drexler, 32, a teammate of Rockets center Hakeem Olajuwon at the University of Houston, is Portland's all-time leader in scoring, assists, steals and rebounds.

Drexler asked for a trade before the season and made his request public in January, saying he was unhappy with the direction of the franchise. He had already left for Houston on Tuesday night as the Blazers were preparing to play the Mavericks.

"It's something that Clyde wanted and he got what he wanted," Portland point guard Rod Strickland said. "What more could he ask for? He wasn't happy with what was going on here and he's going back home."

Thorpe is an 11-year NBA veteran who leads the Rockets as their third leading scorer at 13.3 points per game and is the team's second leading rebounder at 8.9 rebounds a game for this season.

examples of how athletes can positively influence others.

Closer to home, the members of the Oregon men's basketball team, who take time out to spend with the Emerald Valley Special Olympics, fit the role-model bill — as does Oregon defensive back Jeff Sherman, who has maintained a 3.2 GPA while playing on the ever-so-time-consuming football team.

But sadly, Barkley has shown us that athletes are not living up to the role. He has shown that athletes are not mature enough to accept the role.

Most prominently, however, Charles Barkley has proven that he is not a role model because he is simply not the caliber person or athlete qualified to be one.

Thus another chapter has been written in the "Why Charles Barkley Shouldn't be a Role Model" book. If he decides to go into politics after basketball as he claims he will, we should all work as hard to keep him out of office as we did when former clansman David Duke tried to run for Senate.

Trevor Kearney is a sports reporter for the Emerald.
