becoming an increasingly popular place for prospective students and their families during spring break vacations," said Jim Buch, director of admissions.

The invitation to Duck Days, sent to prospective and admitted students, asked, "Planning your spring vacation? Come explore the beauty of the Pacific Northwest along with the educational opportunities available at the University of Oregon."

Nearly 200 students accepted the invitation on May 27, along with more than 50 the next week and more expected during April, when other spring breaks begin.

Each Monday is tailored according to the audience,

Hynes said.

When the admissions office receives the Duck Days reservations forms, they are able to tell whether most students are in- or out-of-state, and whether they are applying or already admitted students.

While applying students may be interested in "nitty gritty details" of the admissions process, admitted students may be interested in what the campus looks like, Hynes said.

"Our goal is to have them explore the University of Oregon," Hynes said. "Duck Days brings them to campus so they get to see the University itself... they come because we're a world-class institution, and we illustrate why they should come here."

Brian Perry, a 17-year-old senior from San Jose, Calif., and his parents agree that the University definitely excels in at least one area — the dissemination of information to prospective students.

"The University has had tons of contact with Brian," said Paula Perry, his mother. "Through mail, phone calls, meetings and an info night [held in San Jose]."
