

Gift expands journalism school

Plans to remodel and expand the University's School of Journalism and Communication took an important first step thanks to a $400,000 gift from the widow of a University graduate.

The gift contributes to the school's $4 million fund-raising goal, which is part of the Oregon Campaign, a University fund-raising effort to collect $150 million.

The gift will be in the name of Willis S. Duniway, a 1932 University graduate. A long-time Oregon reporter, Duniway worked with United Press International and The Oregonian. Dorothy Duniway, his widow, made the gift.

Willis Duniway's journalistic history extends beyond his own life, however.

His grandmother, Abigail Duniway, was a women's suffrage leader in Oregon and founded and edited the suffrage newspaper New Northwest.

His great uncle was the editor of The Oregonian and a well-known critic of women's right to vote.

"What's so impressive about the gift is we're looking ahead to what we're going to be in the 21st century and to have a gift so steeped in Oregon history is amazing," said Duncan McDonald, school dean.

The gift sets the stage for change in Allen Hall. University Provost John Moseley said the journalism school is one of the areas on campus with the largest financial need.

The expansion and remodeling of Allen Hall may include new classrooms for seminars and presentations and a 100-seat amphitheater-style room, McDonald said. An electronic-media studio could include video production facilities, a television news room and a radio studio.

A new media center would "examine the convergence of TV, computers and telephone communications," he said. "We need 12 to 15 thousand square feet." Finding that space could mean moving the printing press from the school's first floor to another part of campus.

"Faculty, classrooms, labs and programs need to be in the central part of the campus," Moseley said. Oregon Hall services, dormitories and the printing press should all be positioned at the edge of campus, he said.

Other options for creating space include a new floor or a new building.

"In another month, we'll have a better idea [if the printing press will move]," McDonald said.

"If it weren't for the [Duniway] gift, we couldn't even think of the possibilities," he said. "You could not have hoped for a better start."

The campaign for the $4 million ends in 1998, but "we're going to get it before then," McDonald said. "The question for the school is how do we honor the past and prepare for the future? Duniway's gift answered the first question."

Museum to offer nature excursions

Education and ecology will be the focus of a series of 11 nature excursions offered by the University's Museum of Natural History.

The series represents the museum's "Learn the Landscape" program offered every summer. The trips occur twice monthly, beginning this Sunday, and run through September.

All trips are day-long except for one, which is a three-day trip to Newberry Crater. The other trips are local and involve only an hour or two of driving, said Joseph Minato, one of the trip leaders.

The first trip is April 9, and will explore Oregon's coastal forests. These forests generate international interest because of their rarity, Minato said.

"It is one of the last remnants of Oregon coastal rain forests," he said.

Minato recommends that people register for the trips early because they could fill up fairly quickly. The number of people allowed on each trip ranges from 12 to 15. Oregon law requires that groups traveling into a forest have a maximum of 12 people to minimize ecological damage.

The museum likes to keep its field trips small because of their educational focus, Minato said. The first two trips still have openings.

The trips aim to educate people about the archaeological history and the ecology of the places each group visits, said Minato. He said it's important for people to receive a range of knowledge about the environment.

"We try to be well-rounded when we focus on a place," he said.

Minato stressed the impact humans have on the environment and emphasized ways in which people can limit the amount of damage they cause while visiting natural sites.

Because the trips focus on education, they require only a moderate amount of physical fitness, but participants must be able to walk three miles, he said. Minato stressed that the trips are geared toward adults, not children, who are often not ready to handle a day-long educational excursion.

Minato is the founder of Nearby Nature, a local group that teaches nature education to elementary school students. He also teaches natural history classes in Eugene through Antioch University in Ohio.

Half of the trips will be led by Minato and the other half by Dennis Lueck, who teaches field classes in natural history at Lane Community College and leads nature walks on Sunday afternoons.

The day trips cost $20 for museum members and $25 for nonmembers. The groups will meet at 8 a.m. in the museum parking lot and will return to the museum by 6 p.m.

The trip to Newberry Crater costs $100 dollars for museum members and $120 for nonmembers. Transportation will be provided.
