

DJ Ryan Stotze announces the next song in the newly renovated broadcast studio at KWVA. The station spent less than $5,000 on renovations to the office.

"Basically, this is how I spent my Christmas break," he said.

With no training in construction, Pierson said he picked up a hammer and went to it. In one 22-hour stint he built a wooden shelving unit — to house some of the station's approximately 8,000 CDs, records and tapes — from a pile of donated lumber.

He said during the entire time the renovations were taking place, the station continued to broadcast 24 hours a day, seven days a week, as it has since it hit Eugene's airwaves on May 27, 1993.

One listener, hearing the banging in the background, called up and volunteered to help.

"There's something really incredible that's happening here," Pierson said. "I've never seen anything like this here — not with volunteers."

"You couldn't pay some people to do some of the stuff people are doing here for free," he said. The station currently has 81 volunteers, many of whom DJ a weekly radio show.

The expansion was a much-needed improvement to the office, said Scott Drew, KWVA's music director.

Drew, like many others, said he was fed up with the cramped work space and had trouble getting work done.

To him, the expansion "made it much more of a creative environment. Before, everything was compiled into this one room."

Now KWVA has a separate production room, on-air room and office area. They even have a couch in one corner, which Drew refers to as the "social area" of the office.
