and averaged 48,039. "It's pretty obvious the game has paid a heck of a price," Colorado Rockies chairman Jerry McMorris said. His team, which averaged 58,598 for home games last year, averaged 41,671 for its first two games in Coors Field. He has the best advance sale in baseball. "We're over 3 million tickets sold," McMorris said. "We've got an average

4,000 seats left per game left to sell that are not day-of-game." Before the strike, Toronto had drawn more than 4 million fans for three consecutive seasons. Even though they fell out of the pennant race last season, the Blue Jays averaged 49,287 for 59 home games at the SkyDome. Last April, the Blue Jays averaged 48,129 for 11 home games. For their first five home games this year, they averaged just 37,654. "I knew it was going to be bad, but I didn't now it was going to be this bad," Blue Jays president Paul Beeston said. "It'll come back. I'm confident. I don't even worry. But it won't come easily. It won't come quickly and it won't come unless we address it properly with the fans." Baseball executives said the strike caused them to lose a lot of group sales, business that won't be completely recovered until next season. To help attendance, Tony Gwynn and Fernando Valenzuela handed out caps on opening day and the Milwaukee Brewers players threw their caps into the stands. Jose Canseco of the Boston Red Sox spent about five minutes outside Fenway Park on opening day greeting fans. "We've got to use this an opportunity to build between management and the players so we go forward together," Beeston said. "If you look at last year, we lost a pennant race, which is the most exciting part of the season, the World Series and then spring training. Of course it's going to hurt."
