

Department of Motor Vehicles workers Rochelle Sandberg and Jessie Savage spent their Wednesday in the rain to support their fellow OPEU workers. The strike is expected to continue today.

to cheat themselves out of an education.

J.R. Rookard, who works in support services at the physical plant, said students that boycott classes in support of the strike are "just hurting themselves."

"Voicing their opinions are just as good as skipping classes," Rookard said.

Cherie Bonney, ASUO office specialist, was picketing outside the EMU Wednesday. Bonney said students can show their support of the strike in other ways, such as by wearing stickers, and shouldn't miss classes.

"Strikers cannot deter anybody from going anywhere on campus," said Linda King, director of human services. "They can carry signs and march and say things, but our hope is that they wouldn't say anything to deter students from going to class."

King also said that the University was evaluating what the critical services were at the University and would look at alternative ways of continuing services, such as hiring temporary workers or "anybody who is willing."

"Things have gone fairly steadily and all basic services have been covered," said Tom Hager, director of communications for the University. "Some employees have worked very long hours, and there may be an attempt to give them a rest," Hager said.

"I think in general strikers have been very respectful of students," King said.

Approximately 3,626 OPEU-represented employees eligible to strike showed up for work Wednesday, said Mark Fryburg, state spokesman, and 12,128 employees were on strike.
