with the intention of bettering her program above all else. While she got a serious pay hike along the way, she maintained that promotion of the women's basketball program was the top priority, and she must be commended for that. If that holds true, look for the women's basketball games to be a lot more hyped up and a lot more entertaining, and for the women to make a third straight NCAA tournament appearance — something the men's team can't do next year no matter what happens.

Pat Johnson

Whatever sport(s) Pat decides to take on next year, one thing is for sure: he will dominate. This is not a guy who has been bred to come in second. This is not a guy who is content with not being first. I don't even think this is a guy that can have too many things going on at once — after all, two sports and 19 credit hours is almost like living two separate lives. Needless to say, he is something else, and he promises to be the most successful and best known track star at Oregon since a guy named Steve Prefontaine graced Hayward Field.

The men's track and field team

With so many returnees — including Johnson, the whole distance running crew, two top decathletes and several field event standouts — I would be surprised if they don't win the Pacific-10 crown next spring. I'm sure the team wanted to bring the crown back to Eugene this season, but the experience it got in attempting to do so will only better its chances and performances next year. But even if they don't, they will put on some great shows, and probably account for the most unified team at Oregon.
