excellent institution."

In the face of budget cuts totaling more than $54 million for the next two years, Frohnmayer said he is prepared for tough times ahead.

He said the two biggest challenges for him will be concluding the Oregon Campaign and continuing to provide quality undergraduate and graduate programs.

Frohnmayer said he hopes to wrap up the two-year Oregon Campaign — the largest fund raising venture in the history of the state — with donations totaling more than the $150 million target.

He also said he wants to make the world more aware of the excellence of the University, adding the University has kept "too many secrets." The Rose Bowl coverage, he said, helped to tell the United States about the University, not only its athletic programs but the academic ones as well.

Randy MacDonald, University director of legislative and community relations, said he was hopeful that Frohnmayer would seek the permanent post.

MacDonald and Frohnmayer have worked closely this legislative session to, among other things, lobby for more money for higher education. One of Frohnmayer's strengths is that he is well-regarded by legislators and political leaders of both parties, MacDonald said.

"He's seen by both Democrats and Republicans as being a responsible and credible representative of higher education," he said. "Legislators frequently cite that he is one of the major reasons higher education was taken more seriously in the Legislature than in past sessions."

In addition to his demanding job, in the last four months, Frohnmayer has had to live and work between here and Minnesota where his daughter is seriously ill.

Kirsten Frohnmayer, who has a rare genetic disorder called Fanconi Anemia, received a bone marrow transplant at a Minneapolis hospital in February.

However, Frohnmayer was able to provide strong leadership, MacDonald said.

"Despite his crisis in Minnesota, Dave has still been very effective in advocating for funding for higher education," he said. "He's really thrown himself into this job and dedicated himself on a 24-hour basis despite his personal problems."

Kirsten Frohnmayer ready to return home, graduate

After battling four months of operations and defying medical odds, 22-year-old Kirsten Frohnmayer is ready to come home.

Since February, Frohnmayer — the daughter of University President Dave Frohnmayer and a Stanford University honor student — has survived a bone marrow transplant, a surgical mistake that probably caused a stroke and numerous surgeries at a Minnesota hospital.

"I'm counting the hours [until she comes home], but you learn to suppress your emotions just because it's such a tricky period and anything can happen," Dave Frohnmayer said.

Kirsten Frohnmayer was expected to fly home to Eugene on a private aircraft Saturday. However, Dave Frohnmayer said in a phone interview that an hour before Kirsten had to return to the hospital for unexpected diagnostic tests.

"My hope is it's nothing, but things can change at any minute," Dave Frohnmayer said.

Kirsten and her mother, Lynn Frohnmayer, moved into an apartment in mid-May, but return daily for intravenous antifungal treatments.

Kirsten Frohnmayer has a rare genetic disorder called Fanconi Anemia. She received the bone marrow transplant after doctors discovered leukemia in her blood, a common development among those with Fanconi Anemia.

After returning to Eugene, Kirsten plans to attend the University's commencement of some of her friends, Dave Frohnmayer said.

A week later, she and her family expect to fly to Palo

Alto, Calif., where she will attend her own graduation ceremony along with her induction into the Phi Beta Kappa honor society, Dave Frohnmayer said.

Although she was unable to do any course work while in Minneapolis due to her illness, Kirsten had already accumulated enough credits in her three-and-a-half years at Stanford to graduate.

During the next several months, Kirsten will undergo extensive physical and occupational therapy while at home. She faces great challenges in defying various diseases that may try to attack her weakened immune system, Dave Frohnmayer said.

Specifically, she is at risk of contracting graft vs. host disease, which can be fatal to bone marrow transplant patients.

She will also have to develop her lung capacity, which is only at 50 percent currently. Additionally, various fungal infections could be fatal, Dave Frohnmayer said.

"She has always been in good physical shape, which has probably saved her life," Dave Frohnmayer said. "She has a raw capacity of endurance."

Once at home, the Frohnmayers will have to ensure sterile living quarters at all times for Kirsten since even dust could cause various infections, Dave Frohnmayer said.

Dave Frohnmayer said one of the things that has touched Kirsten and her family has been the amount of University support.

"The amount of cards from some students she doesn't even know has been very touching to the whole family," he said.
