"Some people call it boring. We call it smart," Driver said. "All I know is nobody complained until the playoffs."

Besides, he said, "I read a lot about the neutral-zone trap in the papers, but I didn't see a lot of it in the game. That was probably the least amount of trapping we've done. But we did a good job in our zone. We kept them outside, along the boards, where they aren't as dangerous. And we blocked a lot of shots."

Lemaire said most of his players like the system.

"Everyone plays," he said. "They're not there to just go one or two shifts. Everyone is part of the team. Not many teams can say that."

Detroit can't. Bowman often double-shifts his best players, especially in tight games. He might be forced to use more players Tuesday if Keith Primeau, the team's top postseason center, can't play because of injuries to his back and side.

Primeau or no Primeau, Bowman said the Red Wings must "have a lot more determination and desire to fight through" New Jersey's trap.

Bowman isn't critical of the Devils' game plan because he remembers when he coached a relatively weak St. Louis team that made the finals three consecutive seasons using a similar system.

"A lot has been made of the trap situation. It's a forechecking system, not anything less or more," he said. "It's the most difficult thing to get a team doing the same thing for all the players. I wouldn't criticize a team that plays like a team — and that can shut down other teams."

Regardless of the Devils' tactics, the Red Wings feel they must stick to their own game plan.

It was good enough to produce the NHL's best regular-season record and a 12-2 mark in the first three playoff rounds — and maybe that was part of the problem in Game 1.

"We haven't faced much adversity, and everybody thought we'd whip New Jersey," Detroit's Shawn Burr said. "I think we've done a pretty good job of blocking it out, but maybe it's subliminal. All we heard was that we were going to win easily."

They now know they won't.
