Eliminate oppression

I was angered by Keith Cunningham's article (ODE, Nov. 17), regarding the slide show presentation in Naomi Pearce's "Women's Studies 101" class.

He accuses Pearce of ignoring "classroom pluralism" by suggesting that terms "feminism" and "pro-choice" are synonymous.

The feminist movement's goal is to eliminate the oppression of women in all its forms.

Having the right to safe and legal abortions gives women the ability to determine the course of their lives.

Why should a class dedicated to educating women about cultural fallacies that oppress women invite "pro-life" groups that openly oppose the liberation of women?

There is no place in a women's studies class for anti-abortion tactics of persuasion that include fear, guilt, and shame.

When presented with a slide-photo of a woman leaving the clinic after an abortion, my impression was very different than Cunningham's.

I saw a woman who appeared to look relieved. Cunningham saw a Barbie Doll. This is one of the important issues discussed in a women's studies class: men's objectification of women.
