

Men's Basketball: This Kentucky-Syracuse matchup will be nothing like last season's game three or four long jump shots and you think you've discovered a way to beat it. Patience, dribble penetration and offensive rebounding are what's needed to beat a great defense like that."

Syracuse coach Jim Boeheim, who went to the zone because of his team's lack of depth and speed, knows what his team is up against in Kentucky, the pre-season No. 1 pick and a team that was considered the favorite to win it all this season.

"They have tremendous depth and are good at every position, and they are able to inside-outside at every position. That's why they've been the way they've been all year," said Boeheim, who hired Pitino as an assistant in his first season at Syracuse. "They present a lot of problems, and we have to come up with some solutions."

Just like Kentucky has to solve that zone.

"The way we play, we encourage people to take three-point shots," Boeheim said. "But it's not just shooting, it's how you attack it. We have to be prepared for that and adjust to whatever they do."

Whatever Kentucky does, it will be with a lot of players. Pitino uses a 10-man rotation to keep the pressure defense intense and fresh. Syracuse plays seven players, and the starters log most of the minutes. That makes point guard Lazarus Sims the key man in the Orangemen's offense.

When Kentucky beat Syracuse 77-71 last season, the Wildcats were able to force 33 turnovers and rattle point guard Michael Lloyd, who has since left the program.
