Be sure to say farewell to the pioneer statue - a campus landmark that students will never forget.

Well, this is it. You're about to embark upon that mysterious journey through what they call the "real world." How does it feel?

Knowing the general cynicism of people who have spent four years or more in college, you're probably saying, "It feels great!" But if you take a minute to really look deep down inside yourself, you might realize that a teeny-tiny part of you is actually going to miss "Fair Oregon."

After all, you've spent a lot of time here.

You've studied, cried, pulled your hair out and probably even had a few good times beneath the incredible variety of trees on campus. You've slept in its classrooms, partied in its dorm rooms and shaken out your umbrella on its sidewalks.

How do you say goodbye to a place that has become such an integral part of your life?

For starters, go up and look at the pioneer statues. (If you're really feeling sentimental, give them a hug.) Remember the time when you saw the Pioneer Father enshrouded in white canvas, and when you first saw both the Pioneer Mother and Father on your first campus tour.
