another 25 hours a week as a waitress during the school year. She gets no financial help from her parents.

To earn enough for school and living expenses, Merryweather said she spends time working when she could be studying. "Basically my entire weekend is shot. I can't do homework until the end of the weekend, and by then I'm exhausted."

Students are also taking out more loans than ever, Remy said. Half of all state system students will leave school with an average of $20,000 in student loans.

Merryweather expects to leave school with around $12,000 in loans. "I realize that's actually not that much, compared to other people," she said. "But when I think about it, it seems like a huge amount of money. I can't believe I'm going to be in thousands of dollars in debt."

"I know people who are in debt by $30,000, and to me that's like auctioning off the rest of your life. That means no freedom because you have to go to work right away to pay off your loans. It really reduces your options."

"The whole point is that students work hard," said Remy. "But financial realities have put people at a disadvantage."
