Grant funds technology discussion by philosophy professor from PSU

■ LECTURE: Talks center on technology's effects on values in the workplace

By Ben Kwasney
 Higher Education Reporter

Robert Gould wants people to think critically about technology in the workplace and how it's changed their lives.

Gould, a visiting philosophy professor at the University and philosophy professor at Portland State University, led a public discussion Saturday at the 4J Education Center on changes in the workplace due to technology. The discussion also focused on technology's advantages and disadvantages.

"We don't want to lose sight of the upside of all this [technology], but I think we're concerned about the downside," said Gould. "We're concerned about what that means for Americans and our identity and our values as Americans."

Saturday's discussion was part of the 'Nation That Works' series. The series is funded by a grant that the National Endowment for the Humanities gave to the University library system.

Jon Cawthorne, University reference librarian and coordinator of outreach services, said the University's is the only academic library that was selected. Twenty libraries were selected nationwide to receive the grant.

"The goal of the grant is to get everyone involved sharing their experiences," Cawthorne said. "We want people to know it's a conversation."

He said the discussions for each session are different because of the diversity of experiences participants share.

The series of free public discussions will be led by humanities scholars who will focus on the participant's values, beliefs and attitudes about work.

Saturday's participants discussed stress in the workplace, the World Wide Web and computers, child care, capitalism and multinational corporations.

Gould said 75 percent of workers in America say their jobs are highly stressful, and they expect stress levels to increase. He said the number of stress-related and repetitive motion disorders are higher now than in the past.

He said 30 percent of workers who use computers are monitored for their speed and productivity.

Gould is trying to start a peace studies program at the University and said he sees the WWW as an opportunity for peace in the global community.

Gerald Derby, a retired life insurance salesman, said technology has taken away personal relations with people. He said he welcomed computers because they made work easier, but the days of taking the time to talk with a customer are gone.

"I saw all of it disappear, all of it," he said.

The grant and the lecture series allow people to share their views.

"It's important for a grant such as this to look at everyone's experience and reflections," Gould said. "People young and people older have different areas to reflect on."

Gould will lead another discussion on technology in the workplace on Jan. 12. Future topics for the 'Nation That Works Series' include race, ethnicity and the workplace; gender, work and American values; and immigration, migration and the workplace.

As Americans face scarce resources, overpopulation, pollution and toxic waste, we also need to turn to the immaterial resources we have, Gould said.

"I always have a great faith in the abundance of the human spirit," Gould said.

COMMUNITY

City seeks committee volunteers

The city of Eugene is looking for citizens to represent the community on three inter-governmental committees. The three committees include the Eugene-Springfield Metropolitan Partnership, the Lane Regional Air Pollution Authority and the East Alton Baker Park Citizen Planning Committee.

Applications can be obtained from the City Manager's Office at Eugene City Hall, 777 Pearl St., Room 105. The deadline to apply is Thursday, Oct. 31.

United Way's pledges climb

Hyundai Corporation donated $10,000, which was the largest corporate gift this year, to the United Way fund-raiser.

Pledges to the 1996 fund-raising campaign for United Way reached $389,550 this week on its way to making the goal of $2,777,000.

The number of donors giving to United Way has increased by 130, a 35 percent increase over last year. United Way hopes to increase the number of donors to 1,965 this year.

Workers in the area have shown their support by gathering funds and donations at their jobs. Employees at Wal-Mart increased their gift as did staff and teachers at Creslane Elementary School.

Money raised during the campaign will be used to fund over 60 local programs helping people in need throughout Lane County. Programs include services to improve children's lives, feed the hungry and protect families from abuse.

Captioning available at election events

State and county organizations are providing real-time captioning so that people who are hearing impaired can still participate in election events.

Automated real-time captioning is the simultaneous recording and projection of words spoken during an event.

Two election-related events with real-time captioning are the Legislative Candidates Forum on Oct. 22 and the Election Information Forum on Oct. 24.
