Oregon quarterback Tony Graziani may be well enough to play this week against California after re-injuring his knee last weekend against Arizona.

Preview: Bowl hopes will be on the line

him. Wide receivers Bobby Shaw and Na'il Benjamin, along with tight end Tony Gonzales, have teamed up to accumulate 1,969 yards of Barnes' total passing output.

California's punter, Ryan Longwell, may also factor into this weekend's match-up, Bellotti said. Longwell is seventh in the nation in yards-per-punt and has the same stats as Oregon place kicker Joshua Smith in field goals per game. Bellotti is more worried about Longwell's punting ability than his effectiveness as a scorer.

"Ryan Longwell is the number one punter in the league, so field position and special teams are going to be a big factor," Bellotti said.

Defensively California doesn't have a whole lot to brag about as it sits in the cellar of the Pac-10 in yards allowed per game. But defensive back Kato Serwanga is second in the conference and leads the secondary with four interceptions on the year and defensive tackle Brandon Whiting could create trouble for Oregon up front.

"Brandon Whiting is a concern," Bellotti said. "He has a tendency to destroy the pocket for you in terms of your pass protection. He's a guy that we have to be aware of on every play."

Both the Ducks and the Golden Bears are very similar on paper — potent offenses with the ability to score at will and permeable defenses that have been struggling to keep opponents out of the end zone. California is averaging 465.7 yards per game this season while the Oregon defense has given up an average of 460.6 yards per game. There is also a very similar comparison when looking at the match-up from the other angle. Oregon is putting up 441.1 yards per game while California is allowing 463.1 yards per game. These are ingredients for a high scoring affair.

Two of the Ducks' main weapons who were injured last week against Arizona, quarterback Tony Graziani and tailback Saladin McCullough, are hopeful against California this weekend, Bellotti said. Graziani re-injured his medial collateral ligament in his knee but had full range of motion and was expected to practice on Wednesday.

McCullough's prognosis on his hamstring injury was also encouraging to the Ducks' coaching staff because it turned out to be not as severe as was thought after the game. He also had a full range of motion and could walk without pain, Bellotti said, adding McCullough could be ready to go this weekend even if he didn't practice all week. McCullough ended Oregon's rushing drought with more than 200 yards in three quarters of work last week — the best rushing performance by a Duck in four years.

Michael Fletcher and Dameron Ricketts are also expected to be back after long absences because of injuries. Fletcher went down in the game against Arizona State almost seven weeks ago and was initially thought to be out for the season. Linebacker Reggie Jordan is also expected to return this week after missing last week's game with an ankle injury.

Oregon will need all of its players healthy this week against California to keep any distant chances at a bowl bid alive.
