Many fans can argue that the two teams played down, instead of up, to their respective potentials. The Ducks and the Beavers came into the season-ending game with a combined record of 5-14.

The game featured a combined 16 punts, 11 turnovers, four missed field goals and no points — not to mention more blown scoring opportunities than fans in the stands.

"Every time we would have good field position, we'd fumble," said Rich Brooks, the Ducks' head coach at the time.

Brooks also called the game "strange" — which the total offense numbers prove. The Beavers dominated the first half by holding the Ducks to 45 yards in total offense while gaining 156 yards themselves. But the second half told another story entirely: The Ducks owned that stanza with 300 yards to the Beavers' 82.

Strangely enough, Oregon State had a head coach that, coming into the Civil War game, was in very much the same situation as Oregon State head coach Jerry Pettibone is in now.

Then-coach Joe Avezzano's job was reportedly on the line entering the game, as has been reported of Pettibone's position this week. Avezzano also came into the game with a winning percentage similar to Pettibone's — he had compiled a record of 4-38-2, while Pettibone has managed to amass a record of 13-51-1.

The 100th Civil War game will be played on Saturday, and while not every match-up has been the most beautiful thing for fans to watch, they have been memorable.
