

Concert: Bono steals the show with antics

"So, what do you think of all this shit?" he asked the audience. "Like they say in New Orleans, that's some other kind of shit." Between the singer's antics and the band's solid performance, U2 proved that the "PopMart" tour is more than just some dazzling props and glitzy light tricks — even though both were used shamelessly.

Although the entire band put forth enough energy to rock Autzen, Bono stole the show.

During "Mofo," he leapt around the stage in an unself-conscious attempt at martial arts. During "Miami," he strutted out onto the catwalk and performed clumsy hat tricks for the audience, smiling at a failed attempt to flip a fedora onto his head with an umbrella. He went through three costumes throughout the concert, one of which featured a chest and back of bulging (but painted-on) muscles. He ended the show in a black suit studded with reflective polka-dots.

U2's music contained as many surprises as their stage antics. After singing several numbers, including "Staring at the Sun," Bono introduced The Edge, who then took over the mike while the singer went backstage to change.

"Tonight, for the first time ever in Oregon, for you," the guitarist said just before breaking into "Daydream Believer." The lyrics appeared on the video screen so the audience could sing along.

Most of the music played was from Pop, and these songs went over well with the audience; they sounded polished even though the tour is still in its infancy. However, no one complained when the band played old favorites such as "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For" and "Where the Streets Have No Name." After all, they're U2.

The last strains of the final song are still echoing, and Bono wishes the audience good night. The neon is extinguished, and U2 leaves the stage. The show is over.

Or is it?

Suddenly the 35-foot lemon that has been leaning in a corner of the stage is "peeled," revealing the gigantic disco ball underneath. The lights snap back on, and the stadium is freckled with millions of revolving dots of light. The lemon begins to advance onto the catwalk.

As the top of the lemon begins to rise, the audience knows what's coming. Mullen, Clayton, The Edge and Bono are standing inside the fruit. They descend a ladder and begin to play once more at the end of the catwalk.

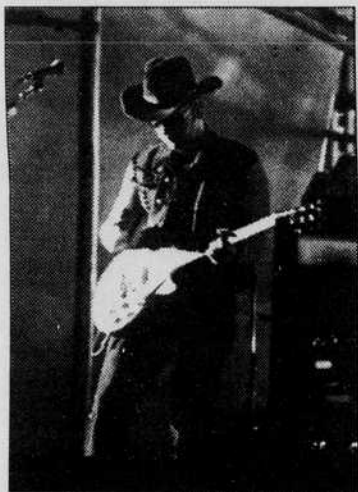

U2 is back for an encore.

The "PopMart" set includes a 100-foot arch and a huge video screen.

Bono sings to the crowd from center stage.

The Edge plays a solo during one of the band's opening numbers.

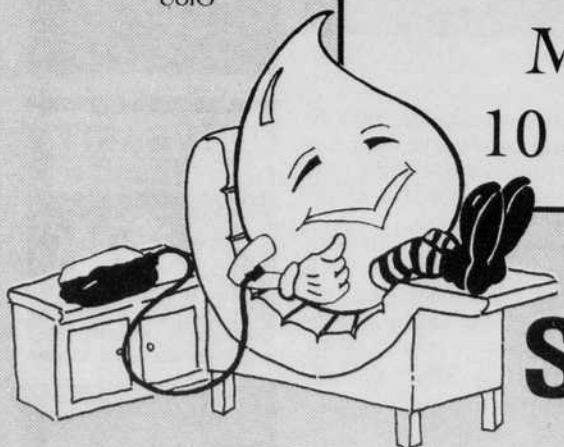

U2 was on stage for a total of two and a half hours, including encores, during their Tuesday night concert at Autzen Stadium.
