

Coverage lacking

I am a student athlete on the women's soccer team, and I think that I speak for my teammates when I say we have not received our fair amount of deserved and needed coverage by the Emerald.

Let me begin by informing you of what the women's soccer team has been up to since February. We have been practicing for our spring season (in case some of you weren't aware). We have played in tournaments against some very reputable teams resulting in victories over Portland State and OSU and ties with WSU and nationally ranked UW. I believe one of our tournaments was mentioned before we went; however, there was no follow-up.

I find it ironic that some teams get an amazing amount more recognition than others. Football, for example, seems to get more coverage during the spring than the spring sports. Worst of all, they don't even compete against other teams.

Don't get me wrong, I like football as much as the next guy, I just think that school newspapers should be focusing on most to all activities that happen at their school. I realize that soccer doesn't receive nearly half of the fan support as some other sports, but the only way the less recognized sports can gain support is if people are informed about them. Isn't this the purpose of the Emerald?

Young greed

The Oregon Daily Emerald, or the Daily Error, as professors used to call it in my time as a University undergrad a long time ago, published a shallow opinion on May 14 representing someone or a group naming themselves the "Emerald editorial board."

"Our Opinion" basically consisted of whining and demanding that the small property owners should continue to provide the authors with ever increasing amounts of cubic monies without giving any thought to the inequalities or lack of fairness of their demands and that of the tax system.

"We look at the era before Measure 47 fondly," it states. Maybe they are not old enough to remember before Measure 5. I fondly recall the era when paying for tuition, fees and books was less than $100 per term. So what? So much for justice for the rest of the citizens that are not represented by the editorial board at the Emerald.

What do they teach in class these days, greed? Didn't the majority prevail and make a statement with Measure 47? Or didn't the Emerald take notice. It is advised that if you want to whine for money, confine it to writing to your parents.
