

Memorial: Kirsten called a 'pioneer'

mental therapy to maintain her leukemia's remission after a previous chemotherapy treatment.

Bagby described pioneers as people who were willing to take on great risk to help others. The information gained from Kirsten's therapy would help many people after her, and it was recently published in Science Magazine, Bagby said.

The ceremony ended with a slide show of pictures from Kirsten's life. The slide show ended with a video of Kirsten's graduation speech.

"Remember to appreciate and protect what you have, be optimistic and constructive in the face of adversity, and stop to smell the roses," Kirsten said in her high school graduation speech in June of 1991.

Aiken summarized Kirsten's philosophy: "Don't sweat the small stuff, and live each day to the fullest."

Frohnmayr was a 1991 graduate of South Eugene High School. She was her class valedictorian and served as student body president. She went to Stanford University where she majored in human biology and graduated Phi Beta Kappa.

Marine sergeants accused of assault

ATTACK: One of the two men accused in the incident has been sentenced to three years probation for car theft

By Amy Corneliusen
The Associated Press

PORTLAND — It was a trip geared to motivate 130 Marine recruits, many still in high school, with a day of white-water rafting on the Deschutes River, followed by a night in a U.S. Forest Service campground.

But from the darkness, a recruit on security watch heard cries for help.

He awoke three Marine escorts and they found a hysterical man who, once he calmed down, said he and a female friend camping about a half-mile away were attacked by two men, and the woman was raped.

The men he described as their attackers are Marine sergeants who work in Portland-area recruiting offices.

Sgt. Rudolph Jackson, 29, of Gresham, a Marine recruit administrator in Portland, was arraigned Monday on charges of second-degree kidnapping, third-degree assault, first-degree rape and second-degree sex abuse. His bail was set at $200,000.

Sgt. Clinton Allan Bergmann, 24, of Vancouver, Wash., a recruiter in the Milwaukie office, was arraigned on charges of second-degree kidnapping and third-degree assault, and was ordered held on $100,000 bail.

The two remained in Wasco County custody but were being held Monday night in leased space in another county, a sheriff's dispatcher said. The sheriff's office refused to reveal their location.

Jackson's superiors were unaware that, since moving to the Portland area from Georgia about two years ago, he had pleaded no contest to a charge of car theft in Washington County, and faces additional charges in Multnomah County of stealing a car and possessing a stolen car.

An arrest warrant was issued in Washington County last month after Jackson failed to pay the court-ordered restitution of $2,095 to the California woman whose car he stole, The Oregonian reported. Jackson had been sentenced to three years' probation.

Multnomah County authorities issued a warrant last November after Jackson failed to appear in court on charges stemming from a carjacking. Police said Jackson stole a Toyota 4-Runner at gunpoint from a woman in downtown Portland last July.

The Oregonian said Jackson also had been convicted of second-degree burglary in 1989 in Bainbridge, Ga. Details of the Georgia crime and Jackson's sentence were not immediately available.

Maj. James Cameron, the man in charge of the Marine Corps recruiting in Portland, said Jackson's criminal history caught him by surprise. "The only way we'd find out about it is if the police call us," he said.

Because the weekend attack did not happen on a military base, the military is waiting until civilian police, prosecutors and courts resolve the case before taking jurisdiction.

"We can't interfere, nor can we try to influence," Cameron told The Oregonian. "We will just wait until they're adjudicated, and then our legal person will find out what happened and if the Marine Corps needs to do anything else."

But when the Marines found the beaten man in a primitive portion of the Clear Lake Campground, they quickly identified the accused sergeants and kept them separated and under watch until Wasco County sheriff's deputies made the 75-minute drive from The Dalles, a county seat on the Columbia River.

Marine officials are fiercely guarding the privacy of the young recruits — most of them 17 or 18 years old, with about 15 females among the group.

But they do not believe the incident would have any impact on the young men and women who will ship out sometime over the next year. The males head to San Diego, while the women will go to Paris Island, South Carolina.

"This is a very isolated incident. What we're looking at here, this is two individuals that acted on their own," said Lt. Jeffrey Sammons, 12th Marine Corps District spokesman, who flew up from San Diego. "The positive image that the Marine Corps portrays will definitely outweigh any of the negativity that this has."

"You can't hold 174,000 people in the Marine Corps responsible for the actions of two individuals who acted on their own," Sammons said.
