Station: Free personal safety classes offered

in price after 30 days.

Mason, as well as others in the police department, have created several services, including neighborhood policing and home safety inspections.

Other services and programs offered include safety training for apartment and motel landlords, police desk reports, community outreach, job training, youth volunteer opportunities, community service work and information and referral to public and private assistance programs.

Mason also teaches personal safety classes, which deal with crime prevention and education, at no charge.

According to Mason, the station relies on many volunteers to serve as staff members and to help with activities.

The station gets many calls from citizens reporting crimes all over the city, especially when other police lines are tied up or unavailable.

The Eugene Police Department is eager to catch criminal offenders, and they hope community members are not afraid to call.

"We encourage people to report," Mason said. "We know there are victims out there."

Mason said the station works "hand in hand" with the University's Office of Public Safety, which is made up of non-certified officers who are qualified and trained to handle campus situations.

"There's no competition between us," she said. "And there's no duplication of efforts."

"They do a really good job of handling the things that don't need a certified police officer," Mason said.
