Law school slated for completion in '99

The new building will have technology spaces and a bookstore annex

By Nicole Kristal
Higher Education Reporter

If you've passed the corner of 15th Avenue and Agate Street, you've probably noticed that construction for the new law school building has been under way for quite a few months.

Completion is scheduled for January 1999 or later.

"It'll be kind of a relief when it's done," said Jane Gordon, associate dean for student and program affairs. "It's definitely ongoing and exciting."

She said the current Grayson Law School building has limited seminar spaces, no available conference rooms and little room to house student programs.

The new building will not only house the law library and faculty offices, but it will also feature a student lounge, a bookstore annex, food services and technology spaces.

She said the technology spaces will prove to be one of the main advantages of the new building because each law student is required to own a laptop computer.

"[Students] will be able to plug in anywhere and have access to the Internet everywhere," she said.

Because of the improvements, Gordon said she will not mind moving to a location outside of the heart of campus.

"We're looking forward to falling in love with the other side of campus," Gordon said.

Because the project was approved by the Oregon State Board of Higher Education last April, the entire project has made quite a bit of progress.

Out of the $25 million the school had to collect to fund the project, only $1.1 million remains.

The University received $10 million from Phil Knight for the project. For this reason, the building will be named the William W. Knight Law Center after Knight's father, an alumnus of the University law school.

The project recently gained an "impressive" $500,000 Kresge grant to finish fund raising.

Currently, the Hoffman Construction Co. based in Portland is working on the project.

The architecture firm of Yost, Grub and Hall, also out of Portland, was selected to design the building after a nationwide search.

"To pick a firm from Oregon was nice," Gordon said.

The firm's location allowed a lot of people affiliated with the University to become involved in the project firsthand.

Overall, Gordon seems pleased with the project.

"It's a win-win for the campus and the law school," she said.
