

UO: Stanford's Crouch allows only four hits

that contributed to two Stanford runs in Game 2. Oregon's five total errors dropped its conference-worst .938 fielding percentage even further off the Pac-10 pace.

Good thing for the Ducks that they possess an explosive line-up and have one of the conference's best big-game pitchers to fall back on.

A day after holding California to just two runs on eight hits, pitcher Jennie Cook held Stanford off the board until the top of the fifth inning, when second baseman Jennie Foyle scored on a one-out ground ball to the short stop.

In earning her team-high 17th victory this season, Cook struck out three Cardinal batters and pitched flawlessly in the second and fifth innings following two Stanford mini-rallies.

"Cook threw the ball very, very well," Gamez said. "She is a gamer. We need her out there. There is no question that she is going to pitch every first ball game."

But Cook can't pitch every game, and Oregon has yet to have a pitcher step up into that crucial No. 2 role.

Oregon's Bethany Smith allowed four hits and two runs in four innings of work in Game 2. The freshman pitcher is still 10-4 on the season but has lost three of her last four starts in the Pac-10.

Stanford broke through in the third inning after catcher Kellie Wiginton doubled to right and Foyle doubled off the wall in center. Foyle went to third on a wild pitch, then came home after Tia Dumas bobbled the ball in left field.

The Cardinal added runs in the fifth and seventh innings to stretch their lead to 4-0, more than enough for pitcher Marcy Crouch, who was having her way with the Ducks' powerful line-up.

Crouch allowed just four hits and held the Ducks scoreless for just the fourth time all season. She was so effective that Oregon failed to hit a ball out of the infield in four of her seven innings of work.

"[Crouch] did a very good job of mixing up her speeds," Gamez said. "We had a tough time adjusting to the change of pace in the second game."

Oregon's players put the blame on themselves.

"We just didn't come out aggressive and ready to hit in the second game," shortstop Jill Robinson said. "We might have been a little timid ... I'm not really sure why we didn't hit the ball."

The result was that for the second straight homestand, the Ducks proved that they can play with any team in the conference — which means they can likely play with any team in the country.

However, Oregon continues to make small, but critical mistakes to lose games, Gamez said.

"We need to come out next week ready to go," he said. "We need more wins if we want to secure a postseason berth. We need to continue to swing the bat aggressively, execute in the field and make the routine plays."
