Shadow: Bessey spoke at meeting

"I want to be able to stop with a student and get a cup of coffee or a doughnut — whatever they do in a real day."

Bessey sat through a series of morning meetings and speaking engagements with the president. In the early afternoon, they attended Bessey's political science class, "Art and the State."

"I hope I don't make a fool of myself," Frohnmayer said with a laugh. "I've done most of the reading, but it's hard."

While spending the day together, the two had the chance to discuss more than just coffee, doughnuts and the weather.

"He probably has an agenda, but I'll be open to it," Frohnmayer said.

Many of Bessey's friends suggested topics to bring up with Frohnmayer, but Bessey said if he had the chance, he would try to encourage the president to keep student fees under student control.

The president's schedule — planned down to the minute — changes constantly.

"He's scheduled up to the minute," Bessey said. "He doesn't have time to go home and watch Jerry Springer like students do."

Bessey said he was impressed as the president rapidly shifted gears between examining paperwork, speaking to a packed ballroom crowd and preparing for an upcoming public appearance.

Bessey attended a planning meeting with Frohnmayer and other campus administrators in the afternoon. As the only student present, he was asked to give the group his input.

"I think I was pretty well received," he said.
