EMU

said Allyson Workman, a student eating in the Fishbowl. "It seems more friendly. I think in the long run the changes were necessary."

Another returning student agreed. "It was worth every penny and every day that was spent doing this," said Michelle Turner, a student reading in the EMU Fishbowl.

But Workman said the food choices offered don't reflect the variety she expected.

"They offer lots of breads and muffins, but don't offer a lot of substantial food," she said.

Although the first round of renovations have been completed, students shouldn't get used to the idea of an EMU without construction. Phase two is already in progress and should begin this year.

Last year, students voted to spend $555,000 to install a new elevator for access to areas such as the International Lounge, the Adell McMillan Art Gallery and the Oregon Daily Emerald.

Currently, students with disabilities are unable to reach these areas because the lift system can no longer be used.

Miller estimated the project should take eight to nine months to complete. He emphasized that the majority of the construction will be external, causing little interference for students within the EMU.

For the EMU board, the renovations do not stop with the new elevator. Miller said new fire alarms need to be installed in the EMU and telephones added to the existing elevator to meet city codes.

Also, the board, with the help of the international office, plans to raise funds to redo the International Lounge. Miller hopes the fund raising will get it going, but no date has been set for these renovations.

"Students would like to see more office space that is efficient," Miller said. "But we are under mandates to bring areas not touched by the renovation up to code."

For a few months, the EMU is quiet and calm. The sounds of construction, however, seem to be a fixture at the EMU. The equipment should be rolling in soon.
