Fletcher

clear to the man who has been as close to him as anyone over the past year.

"First, it's just from him working hard," says fellow safety Brandon McLemore, Fletcher's former roommate. "Ever since he's been here he's worked on his punt returns, his defense and in the weight room. [Special teams coach Tom] Osborne puts him in good situations, and Mike comes through."

McLemore has watched and played on Oregon's special teams the past three seasons and says the difference between Fletcher and Johnson is obvious.

"I think Fletch has more natural instincts than Pat had," McLemore says. "Pat had natural speed and talent, but Fletch has the natural instincts, and he just gives it his all every time."

"He's grown up more off the field," McLemore adds. "He's more into football, he talks about it at home. We used to always mess around, but now he's realized that football is a lot more important."

For his part, Fletcher is trying to impart some of those sentiments on his younger teammates through leadership. Fletcher is often the first Duck out of the tunnel on game days, leading his team onto the field literally as well as metaphorically.

FLETCHER

"It's not surprising to me at all," Bellotti says. "He's exciting. He wants the football. He wants every opportunity to field the ball."

Fletcher took some heat for refusing to call fair catches earlier this season, but now it all makes sense. Each punt return is one more chance to prove himself, and he will take every chance and run with it.
