Alternative recommendation of the Riverfront development. Higher density allows six buildings in the EWEB pole yard, leaving the rest of the river view sector free of development.

The decade-old plan for the Riverfront Research Park is designed to create 25 buildings and parking structures on a 67-acre area on the south bank of the Willamette River.

piled by Connaissance International interviewed substantial stakeholders in the park but not one student was interviewed.

Public input on the Riverfront Research Park has averaged 50-to-1 overwhelmingly opposed to expansion, according to the committee report.

"I'm sure it [the report] won't satisfy many people," Palmer said. "But we studied it in great detail."

Palmer said people need to look at the big picture and what needed to happen.

"It won't remain undeveloped forever," Palmer said. "Forever is a long time."

The committee delayed the discussion of the river view area of open space along the south bank of the Willamette river and the soccer field near the Autzen footbridge until another review.

"The basic idea we realized was that it was premature to build in the river view sector," said Paul Engelking, a petition signer and member of the committee. "We put that decision off. The river view sector is not on the bloc right now."

Tom Lester of the Mill Street Bridge Committee said the recommendation is not adequate because the plan ensures unimpeded development for phase two of the project to develop the area north of the tracks at the EWEB pole yard.

Lester partly blames the city for encouraging development along the river by designating the area an urban renewal district which receives incremental tax breaks for development.

Lester and his group wants to preserve the natural character of the river and the plan to develop high density buildings in the EWEB yard would destroy the view from the north bank.

"It's like trying to hide an elephant in the living room," Lester said. "It's so big no matter what corner you stick it in, it's still big."

Lester said the University could give the land to the city to develop a park in the area or it could negotiate a land swap.

"It isn't the University's job to run parks," Palmer said. The land is an asset to the University which would eventually be developed, he said.

Lester has not lost hope that Frohnmayer could change his mind about developing the land.

"It's entirely possible for public pressure and public opinion to change the minds of public officials," Lester said.

The recommendation now goes to the President and then into a discussion with the Faculty Advisory Council, city officials and the seven-member Riverfront Research Park Commission.

"Frohnmayer can take this to where this can be a win-win situation," Olson said.
