quickly, Williams said. "It really didn't require a lot of discussion," he said. "It was pretty clear that the Oregon law went against the amendment. There will be no reason for us to change these laws. It seems to have worked well so far and didn't require changing."

The amendment, which passed into federal law early in October, was sparked by a string of alcohol-related deaths on Virginia campuses last fall. A Virginia task force on college drinking recommended in July that Congress exempt drug and alcohol records from the privacy requirement.

According to the 1997 Oregon Revised Statutes, "Whenever a student has attained 18 years of age or is attending an institution of post-secondary education, the permission or consent required of and the rights accorded to a parent of the student regarding education records shall thereafter be required of and accorded to only the student."

In the 1998 Compilation of the Oregon Administrative Rules, it also states everything in a student's file must remain personal and confidential except for directory information and objective evidence of a student's academic achievement.

"For a thing like the business of the state, including universities, the state should tend to these matters and be left in the hands of the state, not the federal government," Williams said. "Washington is a long way from here."

Students will probably be relieved and happy that the University didn't uphold the amendment, ASUO Vice President Morgan Cowling said.

"I think it's a great thing this didn't happen," she said. "It's not necessary for colleges to take a parental role and rat on their students. I would have been very upset and so would have many others at the University for overstepping the boundaries."

"College is a time for growing up and making your own decisions and not having parents, the University or someone else interfere."
