Riot

sentencing under the municipal code," he said.

Currently, the charge of rioting can bring a maximum of five years imprisonment and $100,000 fine.

"We want to create a bottom line in this community that this type of activity will not be tolerated and that you'll go to jail, that you'll face sanctions," he said.

Hill said he was proud of the way Eugene police officers acted Halloween night, especially the way police gave repeated orders for rioters and crowds to leave before using tear gas.

Hill said the police have been working with the University and the West University Neighborhood for a number of years.

"We will continue to work with our partners in that area to address these issues, and we're not going to give up," he said.

Laura Blake Jones, associate dean of student life, said the University is not going to give up, either. The Office of Student Life helped plan many of the non-alcoholic campus events.

"Well, obviously we didn't prevent it from happening, but we think we were successful in keeping many people away from it," Jones said.

Jones estimated 1,200 students attended the on-campus events, but she is doubtful that on-campus events will prevent future riots.

ASUO Vice President Morgan Cowling said the ASUO is trying to put together more activities on campus. But she said beyond non-alcoholic events, which may not attract people most predisposed to riot, she does not think there is a way for on-campus events to solve the riot problem.

"I don't think there is anything that could bring in the whole campus," she said. "I think definitely whatever the answer is, it has to be a cooperative effort with the police."

Cowling is critical of police for overreacting to some incidents Saturday night.

"I think it's a problem when they come up with a [SWAT] squad," she said.

But at Hill's press conference, Eugene police Sgt. Rick Gilliam defended criticism against police.

"We're criticized if we move too fast, we're criticized if we move too slow," he said.
