Budget

distance learning services with this part of the funding. Another $15.3 million may be allotted to continue the tuition freeze for resident undergraduates at the seven state universities.

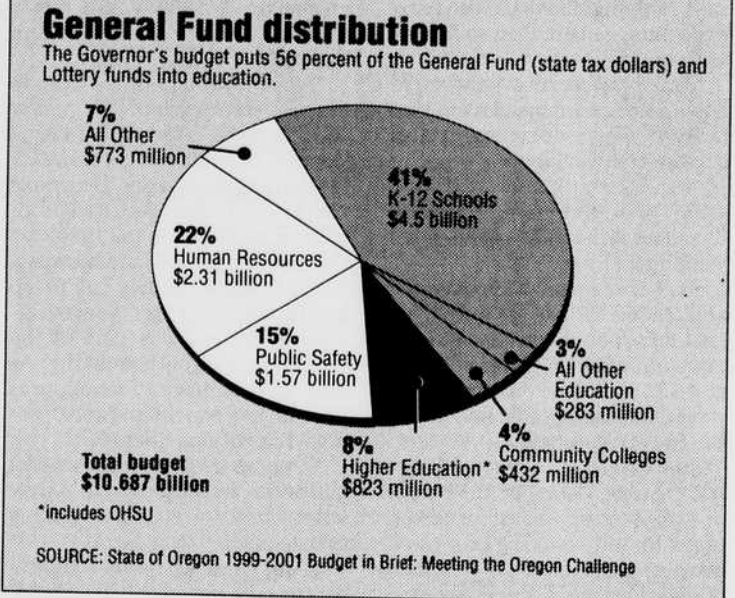

Recruitment and retention may be targeted with another $5 million, and $44.7 million may go to OUS to operate its new budget model.

OUS asked for $115 million in additional funds for the new state funding model that would be more independent and student-centered. However, with the addition of only $73 million to higher education, the full amount will not be reached, said Jean Thorne, education adviser to Kitzhaber.

Kitzhaber told the Board of Higher Education to "go back with the $73 million and figure out how you're going to redo this," she said.

However, the $73 million proposed allotment is a good starting place, said Philip Bransford, OUS spokesman.

"This will provide a strong foundation for the budget model," he said. "It's analogous to a car. What we're trying to do is to fill the gas tank. Gov. Kitzhaber took some steps to get the most amount of gas into the tank."

By deciding what is the most important, the board should be able to decide where it can spend more or less of the proposed allotment, Thorne said.

Kitzhaber's proposal will go to the legislature and will be amended to arrive at a final figure. After the legislation makes its own "signature stamp" on the budget, the board will have a chance to go back and make these changes, she said.

"The budget committee for the board will work closely with the legislature and the governor to work out the details," Bransford said.

Thorne said the flexibility of the OUS budget model and the legislature makes finding middle ground a little easier.
