Forenics puts student debaters on the spot

Student Molly McClure of the Forensics Debate Team has only five minutes to convince her peers of her argument.

Team members must be prepared to argue any subject on any level and in a variety of styles

By James Scripps Oregon Daily Emerald

Since 1876, the forensics team has been an active part of the University, making it one of the oldest groups on campus. It is the only group that teaches students public speaking and allows them to compete in debates against opponents from other schools.

"Forensics is a place for undergraduates to come and learn the art of speaking and argument that puts them on the spot," said Director of Intercollegiate Forensics Rick Peacor. "It is one of the only places on campus that provides this type of forum."

Several events test a team's ability to prepare to argue for a difficult topic in a limited amount of time — usually only about 30 minutes. Team members participate in events that range from parliamentary debate to interpretation of literature and advocating different public policies

"Parliamentary debate is one of the most challenging formats," said Peacor. "The team member only gets a few minutes to form an educated argument on a topic that is in the news. You have no way of knowing what the topic will be ahead of time, so you have to come prepared for anything.'

"Topics for debate can range from campaign spending to removing U.S. troops from Bosnia," Peacor said.

Team member Tom Suarez, a pre-journalism major, participates in several different events, including debate. He emphasizes the importance of experience in debate.

"Competing against someone who is on a different level from you teaches you a lot about public speaking and about how to present your argument," said Suarez. "About half of our team members have done this before either in college or high school, and that helps a lot."

Professor David Frank, director of debate and public recourse, helps students prepare and form a strategy for competition.

"Arguments are usually presented by someone who agrees with that point of view," said Frank. "It is easier for someone to argue something that is interesting to them."

Another event, interpretation of literature, judges the team member's ability to read and form an argument about a writing sample.

Competitors use a variety of debating styles, including persuasive speech, which lets the speaker try to espouse his or her point of view, and informative speech, which allows the speaker to form an argument using factual data.

Policy debate requires the competitor to advocate different public policies, while a competitor argues to the contrary.

'This topic requires a lot of stamina, because they have to research both sides of the argument and debate at least six times in a single competition," Peacor said.

Headquarters for the forensics team is located in the UO Annex at Kincaid Street and 12th Avenue

Team members meet and learn how to prepare for a wide range of topics. The forensics team usually competes four or five times a month, and the team brings files that have information on everything from current news events to issues of social and scientific debate.
