give them a little recognition.

Full City Coffee Roasters is featured on the page every morning. A picture is taken inside of the coffee shop at 9:30 a.m. each day. The management feels it is a little extra advertising, said office manger Jeanette Park.

"We like people to be able to look there and come here," Park said.

Students who want to make their own Web pages can do it without much difficulty. Any University student with a valid e-mail account has access to his or her own Internet space, said Jon Miyake, University Computing Center student consultant.

"We do it for the fun of seeing people out there on a daily basis and seeing people smile. It's kind of a photo essay of things at different places and different times every day."

All you need to do is create a directory called "public_html" and anything put in that directory will be published on the Internet, Miyake said.

"There are various degrees of difficulty," he said.

You don't even have to know all the HTML codes in order to make a Web page. WYSIWYG — or "what you see is what you get" can configure your information on to the Internet without using the appropriate codes, Miyake said.

As long as students aren't extravagant with their Web pages — adding movie clips or lavish graphics — the University can accommodate students' Web needs.
