

Still marching

Catharine Kendall Emerald

Friday's student-created deadline for the University to join the Workers' Rights Consortium passed without any formal action from University President Dave Frohn-mayer. A promising statement out of Johnson Hall showed the president to be close to having the University join the WRC.

Student leaders and activists marched in front of Johnson Hall on Friday in support of the University joining the WRC, which monitors the working conditions where University products are made.

A ballot measure to request the University join the WRC passed by a 75 percent majority in this year's student election.

While the march did not produce official membership, Frohn-mayer did announce in an e-mail to the University's Licensing Code of Conduct Committee that he is prepared to sign on, pending "appropriate conditions" and final recommendations from the committee.

The committee will meet Tuesday at 10 a.m. in the Johnson Hall conference room.
