students with any type of roommate-related questions or issues to feel comfortable addressing them. They can assist students regardless of whether they reside in residence halls or off-campus housing.

Some students opt to personally select their roommates. They may sign up a close friend or even an acquaintance from high school, even though it can be a little trying for new students to cohabit with someone they've known since childhood, as they are often struggling to leave that life behind them at the same time.

Freshman Ian Taylor chose not to room with his best friend since grade school for this reason.

“It's better this way,” he said. “We still hang out all the time, but we have our own space too. This way we don't get completely sick of each other.”

Next year, the two plan to rent a house together.

Houses and apartments are often the next step from the residence halls. Students all over campus are planning and wondering where to live next year. Of course, a roommate can be helpful when the housework needs to be divided, or maybe they have a good ear to listen.

Many students try to find their roommates before searching for a place.

Other students sidestep the want ads section and move into one of the Greek houses near campus. Being
