image and audio files, such as JPEGs and MP3s, have been replaced with more copies of the virus, Smith said.

Avoiding the virus is actually simple, he emphasized.

"The big thing is don't open an attachment from anybody," Smith said. "The only way you will affect your machine is by double-clicking on the 'LOVELETTER' attachment."

The virus affects only computers running Microsoft operating systems; UNIX and Macintosh systems are unaffected by the virus, he said.

"A preponderance of (University computer users) are running Windows 95, 98 and NT," Smith said.

The computing center had received at least 50 phone calls late Thursday from University computer users who had contracted the virus. Most of the problems involve problems with individual machines, Smith said.

The Love Bug forced the Eugene city government to cut the link between the e-mail system and the Internet. As many as 100 city employees opened the "LOVELETTER," releasing the virus.

There is a procedure computer users who have the virus can do to rid their machines of the virus and delete infected files, Smith said. It can be found on the McAfee Web site, www.mcafee.com.

A Microsoft spokeswoman in Portland said the company has also received many calls. She added, "Microsoft is working closely with the anti-virus community. The virus is still being investigated."

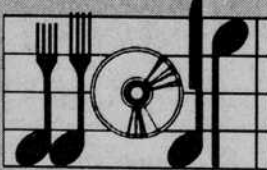

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has opened a criminal investigation of the virus attack.

The Love Bug is very similar to the Melissa computer virus that caused $80 million in damage in the United States in March 1999.

"The protocols and the way the code works is pretty well-designed," Smith said. But it is also relatively easy to create a virus such as the Love Bug. All the knowledge required to create it is available on the Internet, he said.

Smith predicts the virus will continue to cause problems for as long as people have it on their computers. Experts have called the Love Bug one of the fastest spreading computer viruses the world has ever seen.

DDS move

that someone had broken the door's window, which is on an exit in the small office on the EMU's south side.

"It scared me so much that I didn't move," she said. "All I saw was a guy standing there in light colored pants. He stood there for what seemed like a really long time."

Wise, who was driving Sunday, said a passenger pulled a gun on him and the DDS navigator when he wanted to be let out. Wise said the individual was extremely intoxicated and barely able to walk.

"He got really angry and he fell over a couple times," he said.

Wise said he pulled over, let the passenger out and called the office of public safety. DDS records passengers' names and addresses, of all riders and was able to provide that information to OPS and Eugene Police.

"Just all in all, it's been a pretty bad week," Wise said. "We've had some pretty serious stuff happen."

He said that situations in which DDS employees have to break up fights, ask people to leave the vans or just deal with belligerently drunk passengers are not uncommon.

"I don't feel like a lot of the student body understands what we do," Wise said.

But Tuesday night's incident won't stop the dispatcher who was in the DDS office from working with the shuttle service, but she might bring some protection to work the next time she has to dispatch at night.

"She's still working and she is pretty clear about it," Wise said. "I admire her for this."

Wise said DDS employees are hoping to find a student group that would be willing to share its space with the shuttle. He said he hopes to find a more permanent solution within a month.

Resignation

longer donate his personal money to the University.

But on Tuesday, Papé spoke with Kilkenny in an attempt to make him change his mind. Papé said he thought Kilkenny might reevaluate his decision. He suggested to Kilkenny that he throw away the letter.

After Kilkenny sent a confirmation letter of resignation to Papé on Thursday, all doubts were put to rest.

"I regret that Kilkenny chose to use resignation from the foundation board as a vehicle to express his personal opinion ..." Papé said.

Kilkenny, who graduated from the University in 1974, told The Register-Guard on Monday that he would continue to support the University even without serving the trustees.

"I'm not walking away from that. It's a great school with great people, and I wish them all the best. By no means am I bailing out on my interest in that marvelous institution up in Eugene," Kilkenny said.

He was in the fourth year of his five-year term on the board.

The board of trustees is a 50-member group that oversees the trustees foundation, which receives and allocates contributions to the University. Papé explained that Kilkenny will not be replaced because the board can function with a minimum of 45 or a maximum of 55 members.
