lars to alternative forms of transportation," DeFazio said.

DeFazio said he considers the bridge to be one of the highlights of the Riverbank Trail system, which stretches from the University's Autzen Foot Bridge all the way to Valley River Center.

Former Eugene mayor Ruth Bascom was also on hand to reminisce about the origins of the Riverbank Trail, which was cut 28 years ago under her guidance.

"Maybe I love this riverbank trail more than any other Eugenician," Bascom said. "Or, maybe not. ... Not a day goes by that someone doesn't say 'thank you for your work on the Riverbank Trail.'"

Gesturing toward the DeFazio Bridge, Bascom called it "the most glorious part of the whole project."

Framed pictures of the bridge were given to DeFazio and Bascom, and a tracing of the plaque bearing DeFazio's name was handed to him.

Fazio made way for the Eugene Celebration Slug, the mascot of the Eugene Celebration, which led a procession of bicyclists, unicyclists and a bagpipe band across the bridge.

Standing 66 feet tall and 338 feet long, the bridge was constructed in a rather unusual way. Because it uses a special design involving a large central support cable and a number of smaller support cables stretching from top to bottom, the bridge had to be built from the center out.

"This is a unique structure, and because of the suspension design we had to start with the middle observation deck and work our way outwards," Tom Larsen, project manager for the renovation, said.

After the observation deck was hung from the cables, pre-cast bridge segments were added to each side until the completed span reached the towers on either bank.

Bicyclists and pedestrians using the Riverbank Trail can now cross the river much closer to the city's center, rather than using the Greenway Bridge across from Valley River Center.
