Protesters from the Students for the Ethical Treatment of Animals focus their complaints Tuesday afternoon on Professor Richard Marrocco, whose office is in Huestis Hall. Marrocco has experimented on animals in attention deficit disorder research.

Protest

Most of the activists who gathered outside Marrocco's home had also participated in a protest on campus organized by Students for the Ethical Treatment of Animals.

The SETA protest began at the EMU Amphitheater Tuesday at 3 p.m. and led to Huestis Hall, where 17 marchers tried entering the graduate research area to confront researchers. Some of the several OPS and Eugene Police Department officers present turned the protesters away, saying that access to the research area was restricted.

The protesters then stood outside Huestis Hall, handed out flyers and chatted amongst themselves for about half an hour before marching to the site of what will become a zebra fish research facility next to the University Facilities Services building.

SETA co-director Haley Smith, who led the march on campus but didn't go to Marrocco's home, said students should be outraged by Marrocco's research.

"He kills animals, and he tortures animals," she said. "This is taking place on our campus, and we should be more accountable for it."

Marrocco said his research uses monkeys and mice to study attention deficit disorders. After experiments are completed, he said, animals are killed and their nervous systems are analyzed.

"I guess I'm a speciesist," he said. "We're the dominant species here, and we have to decide what's best for humanity. We can make a difference here, and it would be immoral not to."

Marrocco said the protest outside his home, the second in as many years, hasn't discouraged him from doing his work.

"This comes with the territory," he said. "These people are a minority. The vast majority of people on campus support what I do."

Tom Dyke, Vice Provost for Research, said the University conducts research using animal subjects including mice, rabbits, zebra fish, freshwater fish and monkeys.

"Animal models are the only way to find the type of information we want to get at," he said. "No treatment of humans has been discovered without animal research."
